

Design for the Environment Wetcleaning Directory

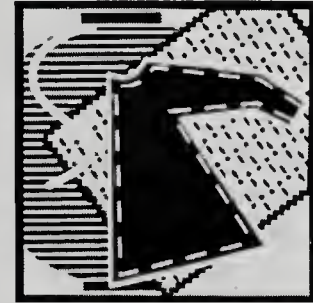

Clothes Cleaning Establishments That Offer Wetcleaning Services

The following is a list of professional clothes cleaning establishments with the ability to provide wetcleaning services. Companies are listed alphabetically by state or country. While all of the shops listed here have the capability to perform machine wetcleaning, they may not actually be providing this service to their customers at this time. This list is based on research conducted by the EPA, the Center for Neighborhood Technology, and Greenpeace. For a current listing of wetcleaners, consult the Greenpeace web page at: <http://www.greenpeaceusa.org/media/factsheets/wetcleanlist.htm> An * indicates a shop is 100 percent wetclean (no other solvents in shop).

Currently, most of the nation's 34,000 commercial dry-cleaners are using perchloroethylene (PCE or perc) as a solvent to clean clothes. But growing concern that perc can cause health and environmental problems, as well as changes in regulatory requirements and landlord restrictions, have spurred research on new ways to safely clean clothes. As part of a cooperative effort between the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) and the clothes cleaning industry, the EPA Design for the Environment (DfE) Garment and Textile Care Program (GTCP) Program encourages drycleaners to explore environmentally preferable technologies capable of cleaning garments labeled "dryclean only." Aqueous cleaning systems, otherwise known as professional wetcleaning, are one example of an environmentally friendly technology that numerous companies in the garment and textile industry have begun using.

Consumer demand for wetcleaning is on the rise. This increase is evidenced by the increasing number of facilities offering wetcleaning services, the dramatically increasing number of machines that wetcleaning manufacturers report they have sold in the past few years, and the growth in the number of new wetcleaning products on the market. Other improvements that have made wetcleaning a more viable and safer clothes cleaning process include the development of specialized detergents, fabric softeners, dye-setting agents that reduce bleeding, mild bleaching agents, and fabric finishes that restore fabric hand.

For more information on wetcleaning, please see the EPA document titled "Case Study: Wetcleaning Systems for Garment Care" (EPA 744-F-98-016).
